OPERATIONS

The 106th, the first communications squadron in the Illinois Air National Guard and the forerunner of the 264th, was Federally recognized on 19 February 1948 with a primary mission to provide telephone and teletype communications for the 126th Wing.

On 2 April 1951, it became part of the 156th Aircraft and Warning Group of the Illinois Air National Guard, with a new mission: to provide inter-squadron communications.

In July 1962, the squadron's designation was changed from the 106th to the 264th Communications Squadron, and its mission to provide necessary communications support for any Air Force organization to which the squadron was assigned or attached. The 264th became part of Tactical Air Command, and on 1 April 1976, the unit designation was changed to its present 264th Combat Communications Squadron.

The 264th has participated in annual Field Training all over the country, with its latest deployment being to Fort Bragg, North Carolina engaged in Operation "SOLID SHIELD '76", to which the unit supplied 84 personnel.

The 264th Combat Communications Squadron is capable of providing all communications: Telephone, Teletype, Microwave, High Frequency and Cryptographic equipment for a bare military base, with the power and personnel to operate it and the wheels to move it.

The 264th CCS's predecessor organization, the 106th, was called to active duty in September 1951, during the Korean Conflict, and was released from active duty after nine months of service.

In July 1962, the squadron's designation was changed from the 106th to the 264th Communications Squadron, and its mission to provide necessary communications support for any Air Force organization to which the squadron was assigned or attached.

The 264th has participated in annual Field Training all over the country, with its latest deployment being to Fort Bragg, North Carolina engaged in Operation "SOLID SHIELD 76," to which the unit supplied 84 personnel.
