

49th COMMUNICATIONS SQUADRON

MISSION

The 49th Communications Squadron provides combat-ready communications-computer services for the 49th Fighter Wing to ensure it is ready to perform its worldwide war-fighting mission.

Squadron personnel maintain airfield radar and radio systems, navigational aids, meteorological radars and sensors, network infrastructure, small computer systems, and cryptographic equipment including secure telephones, and land mobile radios. The squadron also manages and operates the base information transfer center, telephone switchboard and systems, blackberries, radio frequencies, and base communications security program. Some unique functions include worldwide maintenance of the Solar Optical Observing Network and maintenance of the specialized command, control communications, computer and intelligence equipment supporting F-22A operations.

EMBLEM

Blue represents for the Air Force's theater of operation, the sky. The white band with the arching lightning flashes symbolizes the unit's mission to provide communications, navigational aids, air traffic control and maintenance services in support of air operations. The red horizontal band is a design motif of American Indians indigenous to the area of the unit's home base. The yellow lightning flash alludes to the unit's ability in providing communications for that base. (Approved, 29 Sep 1981)
