OPERATIONS

On 24 September 1948 the 78th Fighter Wing was established at Hamilton AFB, California by the Hobson reorganization plan, with the 78 FG becoming a component of the wing, controlling its flying resources. Redesignated the 78th Fighter-Interceptor Wing in January 1950 as part of ADC.

The group's squadrons (82d, 83d, 84th FIS) flew numerous interceptors for West Coast air defense. Inactivated on 6 February 1952 as part of a reorganization of ADC, its operational element was replaced by the 4702 DW. Its support elements were replaced at Hamilton by the 566th Air Base Group the same day.

In 1956, it was decided to elevate the operational units at Hamilton back to a Wing level, and the wing was activated, with its operational squadrons still controlled by the 78 FG. The group component of the wing was considered to be a redundant level of organization by the late 1950s, and the 78th FIG was inactivated on 1 February 1961, with its flying units being directly assigned to the Wing. The 78th Fighter Wing was the host unit at Hamilton until it was inactivated in 1969 in another effort by the Air Force to close the facility, as well as the lessened need for aircraft air defense in an age of ICBMs.

The 78th Flying Training Wing replaced and absorbed resources of the 3560th Pilot Training Wing at Webb AFB, Texas, on 1 December 1972. Squadrons were 82d, 83d, 3389th Flying Training Sqdns. The wing performed pilot training for both USAF and allied officers.

In 1977 the end of the Vietnam War meant a decrease in the need for Air Force pilots and Webb AFB was closed. The 78th FTW was inactivated.
